

Abstract of the Disclosure

A nail-driving tool comprises a cylinder defining a chamber for reciprocatingly receiving a piston. A bumper is received in the chamber and comprises a first bumper section and a second bumper section made of a material having a rigidity different from that of the first bumper section. When in a driving stroke of the piston toward the bumper, air in the chamber exits the cylinder via ports of the cylinder.